The Center for Child Health Care Studies in the Department of Population Medicine, Harvard Medical School and Harvard Pilgrim Health Care Institute, is seeking a faculty member in child health services research for a full-time position as an instructor, assistant or associate professor.

The Center is a vibrant research group that currently includes seven faculty members in child health services research. Areas of ongoing investigation include asthma, infectious diseases (including vaccines and antimicrobial use), nutrition and obesity, genetic epidemiology, and child health policy. Center investigators are also conducting studies of behavioral interventions for culturally diverse populations.

The incoming faculty member should have a PhD or equivalent, or MD with masters or doctoral-level training and several years of experience in research. He or she is expected to add to areas of ongoing research and/or establish new areas of expertise for the Center. Expertise in health care delivery research (implementation science), behavior change, economics, or comparative effectiveness research would be highly valued.

Besides their principal research activity, the faculty member will also participate in mentoring research fellows and teaching, and in the broader mission of the Department of Population Medicine. The Department is a unique research and teaching group with joint support from a medical school and a large non-profit health plan. Its multi-disciplinary faculty has a diverse research portfolio in epidemiology and health services research.
